

Mark Niles is a graduate of Wesleyan University and Stanford Law School. After receiving his J.D. in 1991, Mark clerked for Francis D. Murnaghan, Jr. on the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit. He then worked as a litigation associate at the Washington, DC law firm of Hogan and Hartson, until accepting a position in 1994 in the United States Department of Justice, Civil Appellate Staff. At the Appellate Staff, Mark filed briefs in cases covering a wide range of issues including federal tort liability; employment discrimination, transportation, disability, freedom of information and veterans affairs regulation. He argued cases in the Fifth, Ninth, Eleventh and Federal Circuits during his tenure at the Department.

In 1998, Mark accepted a tenure-track position as Assistant Professor of Law at American University, Washington College of Law. He teaches Civil Procedure, Administrative Law, Governmental Liability and Law and Popular Culture. Mark was promoted to full professor with tenure in 2004, and also became Associate Dean for Faculty and Academic Affairs in July of that year. In addition to his teaching, scholarly and administrative duties at AU, Mark currently serves as the Reporter for the Maryland Civil Pattern Jury Instructions, prepared by the Maryland State Bar Association Standing Committee on Pattern Jury Instructions. Mark has published various scholarly articles and essays on subjects including the Ninth Amendment, federal tort liability, airline security regulation, the first decade of the tenure of Justice Clarence Thomas, and the depiction of law and justice in American popular culture.

Mark was born and currently lives in the Washington metropolitan area. He is married and has two children ages 10 and 5. He is a member of the Maryland, United States Supreme Court, First, Fourth, Fifth, Eighth, Ninth, Tenth and Eleventh Circuit bars.
